Implications of Alternative Vote

- It is likely to end single party government and therefore reduce the power of parties to dominate their MPs.
- The influence of the whips will be significantly reduced as no party has an overall majority.
- Mathematically, it could be argued that Parliament will appear more representative as each MP will nominally have 50% of the votes in his constituency.
- There will need to be greater consensus and 'horse trading' in the wake of a hung parliament emerging after an election with post election deals between parties which will not be based on single party manifesto commitments.
